Problems in Political Evolution

By RAYMOND G. GETTELL

Trinity College, Hartford, Conn.

8vo, 400 pages, $2.00

This volume is an attempt to formulate, and to trace the evolution of, the fundamental problems of government. Drawing material from many sources and applying scientific methods of treatment, the author brings out clearly the evolutionary nature of political progress, the connection between institutions and environment, and the constant need for adjustment and compromise in political development.

Among the questions considered are the nature of the state; the leading factors in political development; the relations of the state to the family, the church, industrial organizations, and military organizations; the relations of State to State and of State to individual; and present political conditions and tendencies. At a time when social and political questions are arousing so great an interest, this discussion of the basic principles of political organization, its past development, its present conditions, and its future needs will prove of great practical value.
